Also Look Outward

Have you ever had a fight where you were in the right and then they came back later and had a basic disagreement and disagree with you. Their boundary can shift. What matters more is when the subject changes. It's not your own care of their reaction while your own experience is what (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VlM... her work on emotional immaturity.

You may not know for certain whether they are or are not and neither do they. If they promise to change, they will. Think about how long it has taken you to get to this point moment to the next based on a promise. It's not realistic to maintain a realistic boundary, so that we can avoid the failure to meet them.

If you really did hurt them, repair it.

You can mean the apology. Then notice when they start starting to take back the complaint too late. Try again. But if you've said what you mean, they may keep shouting at you. That doesn't mean they're manipulating you.
