Shaking Qigong / Shaking Medicine

My friend Louka is why I link this class. He had tried many healing and somatic things, including basic TRE. TRE did nothing for him. Nothing helped much until he got into this class, which costs $10 a month on Skool.

The class is much more than just TRE. It has all kinds of movements and positions, and I think that matters for some people because they may need the right position or movement together with the tremor before they find where the blockage is.

By blockage I mean what energy is stuck in you. I often have the natural kind of shaking animals have rather than noticing much benefit from intentional therapeutic techniques. Especially on psychedelics, it is as if my body knows exactly which part to shake and how. It isn't simply “shaking = mental health.” When the right thing is shaken the right way, things loosen up as they should and the energy flows. TRE is a system they are trying to teach en masse. Of course it had to be distilled into something that seems to work most of the time for most people. I suspect some people would have a better chance if they could approach the stuck place from more angles. “Just try lots of stuff till it works” is how my expertise runs on this—and also how you get less chance of being called an expert, lol.

I didn't try the Shaking Qigong class. My firsthand part is qigong, and qigong has been very helpful for me in moving energy. So I can understand why the two would naturally go together. Guided shaking plus qigong also seems like a middle ground between a fully predictable TRE structure and completely unstructured shaking.

The class gives people more than one way in. There is guidance, but it isn't one fixed TRE routine, and people are doing it together instead of alone. Somebody who gets nowhere with stripped-down TRE may do better with that.
