On Tuesday morning, a neighborhood library opened its doors after a week of repairs. The front steps were dry, the lights worked, and every shelf stood in its usual place. A volunteer returned three mystery novels, then helped a child find a book about tide pools. Near the window, two students compared notes for a history assignment while the librarian sorted yesterday's newspapers. Nothing unusual happened. People came in from the heat, filled their water bottles, read for a while, and left with books tucked under their arms. At noon, the librarian watered a small fern beside the desk and wrote the date of the next community meeting on the notice board. By closing time, the returns cart was empty again.
