Key at first asked me innocently, "Can you be my guru?" I told her, "I'm not anyone's guru, but we can learn from each other." A few months later, she was telling me she was much more spiritually advanced than me. I asked, "Do you recall asking me to be your guru?" She said, "Wow, I must have been really confused back then!"

I also have to admit, I can become condescending when somebody stops taking responsibility for their behavior. I find that intolerable. If someone says, "I feel like your patient," both people need to look at their roles.

I know what can happen on my side. Helping feels good. Being needed can feel good too. A lot of the time I really did have the information or perspective they needed, so of course they kept asking me. I also had to look at whether they were trying to take care of themselves without me.

Different levels in different domains can be complementary

According to me, myself, and Irene, I was ahead of Bee, Key, and H. in maturity, emotional stability, self-love, and self-awareness. I also had advantages they didn't, including a happier childhood and more moolah. As you might imagine, all of that affected the balance between us.

They were all ahead of me in childlike wonder and fascinating creative intuition, which is what attracted me. Sometimes their intuition was wrong and they trusted it too much, but I still loved that quality in them, since I tend to be more analytical.

They were also all more social than me. They could organize people for a ceremony or group gathering very easily. I felt like I needed that if I ever wanted to start a commune, because I'm more introverted. I'm good at talking to people when there's a purpose. I'm not as good at rousing everybody up and encouraging them to do things or go places with me. I'm more like, "Everyone can do whatever they want."

So I do believe in mutual coaching and complementarity.

I could teach these women about loving and reparenting their inner child, Buddhism, meditation, and other things I understood better. They could pull me into life more, show me where I was missing people, and sometimes be the skeptic when I was seeing the best in someone and missing their hidden motives.
